FAA USE ONLY

The FAA may issue a replacement airworthiness certificate when a certificate is declared lost, has been mutilated, or is no longer legible. The replacement airworthiness certificate shall carry the original issue date of the certificate being replaced, preceded by a capital "R" in the date block of the certificate. Additionally, replacement certificates will be issued when the aircraft registration number has been changed. In this case a new application for airworthiness certification is not required.

A replacement airworthiness certificate may be issued without supporting documentation from AFS-750 if the date of issuance and the airworthiness classification and / or category of the lost or mutilated certificate can be positively established from the aircraft records, or from the remains of the certificate. If there is insufficient data upon which to base issuance of the replacement certificate, the FAA inspector will request copies of the appropriate data (such as the application form or previously issued airworthiness certificate) from AFS-750.

Before issuing a replacement certificate, the FAA shall review the aircraft records, and if necessary, inspect the aircraft to ensure the applicant's request is justified, and the aircraft is eligible for the airworthiness certificate requested.
